Murdoch signals push into education

Vision for learning outlined in GS talk

By Tom Braden in Paris

News Corp, Murdoch signaled that the media group he founded is making a significant new push into the educational market, including a high-profile speech by the mogul's son James in Paris.

Describing education as the "new frontier" for digital revolution, Mr Murdoch outlined a vision for personal learning and more engaging lessons delivered by the world's best teachers thousands of miles away via videoconferencing.

"The same technologies that transformed every other aspect of modern life are transforming education, providing our businesses with the talent they need to gather, and give hundreds of millions of people access to the principles of prosperity," the newspaper tycoon said. "We make that happen through our global operations."

The same technologies that transformed every other aspect of modern life

are transforming education, providing our businesses with the talent they need to gather, and give hundreds of millions of people access to the principles of prosperity," the newspaper tycoon said. "We make that happen through our global operations."

With Tom Kitch, the former New York Times managing editor, by his side, Mr Murdoch has visited numerous schools and universities worldwide, including Seoul, Kyoto, Cambridge and Paris.

"Our challenge is to learn from what works best—wherever it is in the world, and join it all together," he said. "My message is determined to try to do that."

That determination will start News Corp's on a bold new path, with its diversified portfolio of publishing, television, film, music and digital assets such as Fox, Fox News, owner of the FT, and McGraw-Hill, both groups have already invested heavily in digital learning, and now need to move personalizing learning and assessment. In a speech to students at a Paris school, Mr Murdoch said that "today's classroom looks almost exactly the same as it did 50 years ago."

James' father also outlined the role of the news media in the education technology market, where the acquisition of US publishing giant Pearson last year created a new York firm that tracks student achievement, provides academic advice and assesses software, for OEMs.

It is clear that the goal of this acquisition is to build on the success of Murdoch's Sky Broadband, a digital learning and delivery arm of the 45-year-old British cable operator.

"The key to success is to not compete in the software space, but rather in the media and advertising space."

"What we need to do is to make education easy,

make it accessible,

make it available," he said.

Online grocers gain ground in US

By Tom Braden in Paris

News analysis

Doubts remain about expanding beyond cities into the suburbs, writes Alan Rapaport

The online grocery business has taken a different road a decade ago than most food delivery services have followed under the weight of economic pressures.

"The key to our software... not a competitor in the software space, but rather in the media and advertising space."

"What we need to do is to make education easy,

make it accessible,

make it available," he said.

After early missteps, has gradually expanded its focus to include urban, rural, New Jersey and Connecticut.

An early participant in the trend, which sources food from stores to shorten the time between purchase and delivery, initially found customers who grocery online were few and far between.

"The company has helped the grocery delivery space," says Michael Lachman, CEO of FreshDirect, a US grocer specializing in grocery delivery.

Now, however, increased competition for grocery delivery has led to a FreshDirect rival, which was founded in 1999 with similar aims.

FreshDirect's New York-based rival, Peapod, has been delivering groceries around Manhattan since 2006 and has had steady growth in the past 18 months, adding customers with consecutive years of growth.

"The company has helped the grocery delivery space," says Michael Lachman, CEO of FreshDirect, a US grocer specializing in grocery delivery.

Now, however, increased competition for grocery delivery has led to a FreshDirect rival, which was founded in 1999 with similar aims.
